The disparate group interviewed for this doc are united by something so fundamental that it overrides their differences: they're all going to die. This statement could, of course, be made of humanity as a whole, but for these terminally ill residents working on a photography project in a London hospice, the appointment is rather more concrete. Their reflections on what matters to them in the lives they have left are powerful and instructive - of all the things they say they'll miss, not one of them costs money. An astonishing film. AM
