True Stories: Up in Smoke

More4, 10pm

Director Adam Wakeling's powerful, resonant film took four years to make and it does an excellent job of exposing how slash-and-burn farming generates more carbon emissions than all air and road travel combined. Quietly confident

British scientist Mike Hands has been researching the problem for the past 25 years, mainly in Honduras, and now he thinks he has a sustainable alternative for farming in equatorial rainforests. But can impoverished farmers afford to risk adopting a new farming method, and can Hands convince governments and agencies to back his plans? Alarming, thought-provoking television which deserves to win an award. Mike Bradley
